was "belittled and humilisted before others" and made so nervous that she could not sleep, are among the alleged wrongs set forth in the declaration. All this was done without provocation, says the plaintiff.

The plaintiff is an American and alleges that the defendant made fun of her nationality and of American women in general. She says she was employed as traveling companion by the defendant at Los Angeles, Cal., and that she accompanied her to this city.

Miss Patterson further asserts that she had to appeal to the manager of the apartments to gain admittance on the night in question, and that when she arose the next morning, she found her room door locked. Then she was cut off from telephone communication with the manager's office, she charges. Finally, she says, her employer unlocked her door, and it is alleged while plaintiff was at breakfast the defendant complained to the manager, insisting that she, the plaintiff, be removed from the house. Leonard J. Mather is the plaintiff's attorney.
